Enrodte To New York Via Long Island Sound, Thursday, June 19, 1890. At last, after three months of delightful anticipation, barring the dread ordeal of parting from loved ones, I am on my way to Enrope. Nothing but the wildest desire, with the attendant excitement, could have nerved me for the good-bye at the depot, where a party of friends bade me a hearty bon voyage. My husband lightly kissed his hand to me and waved adieu as the train moved out of the Old Colony depot, and I--well, a great sob welled up in my throat, and, woman like, I cried. Consistency thou art a jewel in woman. Here I was deliberately leaving the best friend I ever had for a summer of pleasure and crying about it, with not a thought of giving it up. Having the faculty of looking on the bright side of everything, I soon dried my tears, and by the time we reached Fall River felt more cheerful, though the weather was not conducive to good spirits, a drizzling rain accompanying us all the way. It is now 11 oclock, the boat is rolling at a fearful rate, which is decidedly uncomfortable, as proven by the hasty exits of passengers, which has left the saloon almost deserted. before the close of the concert. Union Square Hotel, N. Y. , June 20. Arrived here at 7 oclock this morning, going direct to the hotel to...
