Excerpt: . in the charge by which they secured his crucifixion from a complaisantly cruel governor. Jesus own course of action had given to such a charge just enough verisimilitude to accomplish its malignant purpose.--And having accomplished it, like many similar false representations it went much further than its originators had foreseen, and became the very watch-word of the Galileans they supposed themselves to be now permanently suppressing. It may well be questioned, as we have seen, whether up to the crucifixion itself the prophet of Nazareth had been seriously regarded as the Christ by even the most ardent disciple (see however on 14: 3-9). But from the time that he had been put to death as such, it was in harmony with all contemporary habits of reasoning for his following to declare that he was in very truth the Christ of God. His enemies...
